PANDEMIC
PAINTING

My two-year-old loves to create, and so do I. In an effort to conserve our art supplies, we've been painting and repainting the same canvas together. Now we are adding chalk and marker to the mix. I think it is starting to look pretty good!

During the pandemic, my family has engaged in weekly painting sessions as a creative outlet to break up the monotony of sheltering at home. Each week we choose a Bob Ross episode from Netflix, and paint along as best we can. It's been fascinating how different each of our paintings looks from the original (first in each row), as well as from one another. We clearly vary in our innate artistic talent, and it's been fun to see how our skills have evolved week by week. Can you guess which columns belong to mom, dad, and kids?
